Excerpt from Political Observations on the Test Act Fourthly. What is to be laid down on these heads, will be concluded with some strictures on such political arguments brought in favour of the repeal, as seem to be most intitled to consideration. 1. The test act is first to be shown to be part of the Constitution in the higher and stricter sense of the term, from the nature of a Constitution considered in the abstract; and in addition to this, the consequences of its original institution, and the benefits attending its subsequent extension, will be pointed out. Every Nation, not under a despotic Sovereign, is governed by written or by traditional laws called customs. The laws are divisible into two classes: the first which relates to the governors, and the second to the subject: those relating to the governors are called Constitutional. The laws therefore which prescribe first who shall govern, and secondly sense of the term; or fundamental laws of the constitution. The function of every government not despotic, are divided into two great branches,...
