Imagine a world where debt could mean permanent servitude, where a debtor or anyone associated with him could receive a life sentence for no crime other than being connected with someone who owed money he or she would never be able to pay. And it was not just servitude. Those who were made to serve had no rights whatsoever. They could be used or punished in any way the owner desired, and no one would care. There were no laws to protect them. As the auctioneer announced, they were legal for all purposes. Elenora was beautiful, with an air of innocence about her. Olivia was a leading socialite, wife of an apparently successful businessman, and determined to be at the very top of County society. Instead, both young women are arrested and are to be sold at the local auction. Elenora will undoubtedly fetch a very high price, but Olivias attitude makes it clear that she is going to be difficult and will not adapt to her new role easily. Quentin Scales, the best buying agent in the County, is certain that his employer will want both of them, even if he has to pay the highest price ever seen at auction in order to acquire Elenora.
