Other large American houses have also relegated the comprador to a less important position and deal directly with the Chinese merchant, accepting as security, in the absence of reliable credit information, a deposit or bargain money, as it is called, to guarantee the contract. Thus we see that the importer or sales agent in China escapes from dependence on the comprador just in proportion as he learns the language and customs and consequently the sales possibilities and credit limitations of the Chinese merchants. Also, the dependence on the comprador will gradually lessen as advertising mediums such as Chinese trade journals reach out to the thousands of small merchants. But with the present development of advertising in China, that is a long look ahead. The Chinese merchant is the final channel through which all foreign merchandise reaches...
