And this is the case, not merely when we are pleased to contrast ourselves as individuals with individuals; but also when this comparison is made by classes or states of men, as if the rich should compare themselves with the poor, or the poor with the rich, or nation with nation, or age with age. And, my brethren, if there be any one danger that more especially belongs to the time and to the country in which we live, it lies in this; that we see ourselves so surrounded by whatever may seem to indicate a superior development of social and intellectual qualities; we have gathered around us in such an eminent degree whatever, in the ordinary estimation of men, can raise one class above another, in all that relates to the ornaments, to the pursuits, and to the success of life, - that we are not a little disposed to look down with some contempt upon those who have gone before us, or who live at a distance from us, and to exalt ourselves in our own thoughts, as though we had gained thereby some true, some solid and lasting advantage.
